Annex no. 1

Fear can appear in two main forms: conditional and absolute. The first is the fear of something, that can be avoided, something, that we can hide from. For example, I'm afraid of math exams, I'm afraid of a storm, but I can hide from it. The second fear is existential. No matter what, we are mortal, and we fear events that remind us of mortality—war, accident, violence—directly reveals our existential transience.

Meanwhile, courage has a wide variety. One can dare to go beyond the established boundaries of the community: class, origin, race, or role. One can dare to question the "highest" authorities of science and culture. Different forms of courage appear in the face of various risks, such as losing wealth or career, changing lifestyle or location, in other words, courage is needed when traveling into the "unknown". But the highest courage appears in daring to join the desperate struggle against slavery, realizing that it is better to die on one's feet than to live on one's knees.

The relationship between fear and courage. Supreme Relation: Despite existential dread, one can transcend the question of life and sacrifice it for a "supreme purpose." Courage can be created by overcoming the obstacles of fear and using them to achieve a goal - this is strategic courage. Courage can be strengthened by showing the irrationality of fear, its overemphasis in specific situations. Courage can be gained through dialogue with those who have experienced fear and overcome it.
